Sphingosine 1-phosphate (S1P), a bioactive lysophospholipid, is present in the brain. The distribution of S1P in rat brain was studied using HPLC with radiometric detection and three different enzyme immunoassays. S1P was found in all brain regions with the highest concentration in the choroid plexus. The regional distribution of S1P varied with brain hemisphere and anatomical region. The content of S1P was unchanged by the injection of alpha-melanocyte-stimulating hormone, and it was increased by the injection of oxytocin. The concentration of S1P in serum after a single intravenous injection of oxytocin was about twice the concentration in blood plasma; the concentration of S1P was also increased in the brain after the injection of oxytocin. These findings suggest that oxytocin and S1P may play a role in the brain.Fate of zaprinast, an inhibitor of angiotensin-converting enzyme, after short-term administration in rats.
